All Aboard the Dreamboat

A Katy Keene Story

THE KATY KAY rocked gently at the dock, all agleam with white beauty and moon-silver, while in the shadows of a barge K. O. Kelly was dying a slow, agonizing death just looking at her. The KATY KAY was the new Van Ronson yacht. Come dawn and the tide's turn, she would point her sleek bow southward on a long traverse of tropic seas. And who would be aboard with Randy and the Van Ronsons and Jeeves and everything that money could buy? Katy Keene would be aboard, and the thought was like a curly stiletto plunged deep into K. O.'s grieving heart.

K. O. took out a penknife and whittled a stick disconsolately.

"What chance have I got?" he muttered. "A tropic moon can turn any girl's head. Katy will come back a Van Ronson! I know it!"

Headlights came along the dock road, and Randy's sports car purred up and stopped near the yacht. Katy was in the car, her lovely hair wind-blown. She was so gorgeous that alongside of her, other girls were just girls. K. O. put the knife away and sat in the shadows, his throat a throbbing ache. Randy got out.

"Wait here, Katy dear," Randy said. "I'll see if mother and dad are aboard."

He went up the gangplank.

"'Wait here, Katy dear,'" K. O. mimicked grumpily.

Aboard the yacht Randy uttered a startled cry. Men were grabbing at him from all sides. In a light from a porthole you could glimpse their vicious faces. They were thugs; no doubt of it. Maybe they were kidnapers. They were brutal and savage, the way they jumped Randy, who fought back gamely.

K. O. came out of the shadows in a wild sprint.

"Katy Katy!" he shouted. "Go for the police! I'll help Randy!"

K. O. leaped for the gangplank. "Coming, Randy!" he yelled.

A hulking man plunged at him. A ham fist whipped a blackjack out of the darkness. K. O.'s streaking hand yanked the weapon from the man's grasp. They grappled furiously on the gangplank until the rail gave way and they hit the water in a headlong splash. When K. O. came to the surface, the floundering plug-ugly was gulping salt water and screaming for mercy, while from the dock road Katy's despairing voice shot chills through K. O.

"K.O.! K. O.!" she cried. "A man's just swung his car to stop me! He's blocking the road!"

"Hold tight, Katy girl!" K. O. shouted. "I'll be there! Keep punching, Randy!"

He'd be there! K. O. to the rescue! HOW? Here in the water he was as useless as a jellyfish. Randy was fighting valiantly, but he was no match for his assailants. K. O. could muscle himself up the yacht's side, but they'd immediately kick him loose from his senses.

K. O.'s world was tearing out of its orbit. There'd be nothing left of it if any harm came to Katy. He felt responsible for Randy, too. After all, HE was the muscle boy.

He treaded water, still clutching the blackjack. It was a bludgeon made of BB shot encased in leather. He hated vicious weapons like this, and was about to sink it when one of Randy's attackers skidded on the deck and went on his ear.

K. O. whistled softly. If he could only skid the others into a nosedive! He got the penknife from his pocket and slit the leather blackjack. BB's poured into his hand. He threw them on the deck.

Angry shouts burst from the men up there. Feet and arms suddenly were going every which-way. It was worse than being on roller skates for the first time. Every time somebody swung at Randy, the BB's under his feet sent the man skating. Feet shot in the air and heads sounded like hollow gourds thumping the deck.

The battle went from a riot to a burlesque. Nobody was upright now, not even Randy. K. O. got aboard, dripping wet, and promptly administered his insomnia cure to all those not already in dreamland.

K. O. and Randy found the KATY KAY's crew bound and gagged below decks. The Van Ronsons arrived presently and so did the police, who led the battered gang off to the pokey. They were kidnapers who'd planned to steal the Van Ronson yacht and hold Randy for ransom.

"If it weren't for you, K. O.," Mr. Van Ronson said gratefully, "Randy would be a prisoner on the high seas now. I know Randy joins me and his mother in inviting you on our cruise. We'll send Jeeves for your things."

Katy threw her arms around K. O. and kissed him. "What fun we'll have, K. O.! Won't we have fun, Randy!"

"Fun?" Randy said dazedly. "Oh, yes, fun!"

Then Randy gave K. O. a sheepish grin. You couldn't hate a guy who'd just saved your life.

As for K. O., he hoped the tropic moon was all that it was cracked up to be.
